CASE MANAGEMENT ORDER NO. 109
(Trial time allocation for Myers v. AbbVie bellwether trial)

MATTHEW F. KENNELLY, District Judge:

In this order, the Court sets time limits regarding the upcoming bellwether trial in Myers v. AbbVie, Inc., Case No. 15 C 1085, which is set for trial on May 7, 2018.

The Court has previously determined to set reasonable limits on the amount of time for the parties to present their claims and defenses during the bellwether trials in this MDL proceeding, to prevent delay, ensure efficient presentation of the evidence and arguments, avoid unnecessary, cumulative, and repetitive evidence and arguments, and minimize undue burden on the jurors. It is well-established that a court has the authority to impose reasonable time limits on the parties at trial. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(c)(4) & (15); Fed. R. Evid. 611(a).

The Court has developed a great deal of familiarity with the cases from presiding over extended pretrial proceedings and, in particular, from trying several previous bellwether cases to verdict, including four AbbVie-only bellwether cases and one Auxilium-only case. For the Konrad v. AbbVie trial, the Court allocated a total of seventy-eight hours, and the parties used seventy-three hours (thirty-six used by plaintiff, thirty-seven used by defendants). For the first trial in Mitchell v. AbbVie, the Court allocated a total of seventy hours, and the parties came in right about that figure (thirty-five hours used by each side). For the Holtsclaw v. Auxilium bellwether trial that was tried in November 2017, the Court likewise allocated seventy hours, but the parties used a total of only about forty hours (twenty-two used by plaintiff and eighteen used by defendant). For the Nolte v. AbbVie bellwether trial that was tried in January 2018, the Court allocated sixty-four hours, and the parties came in right about that figure (thirty-two hours used by each side). For the March 2018 retrial in Mitchell v. AbbVie, the Court allocated sixty hours, and the parties used almost exactly that amount. It is also reasonable to expect that future trials should take less time as the parties and the Court learn from earlier trials, even where the parties and the types of injuries may differ.

The parties originally estimated that the early bellwether trials should take approximately three weeks. Based on the Court's experience in presiding over the five previous bellwether trials, that was an overly generous estimate that essentially assumed unnecessary repetition of points and presentation of unnecessarily cumulative evidence. The Court also notes that even with the shorter-than-three-weeks limits imposed in the previous bellwether trials, there has been a significant amount of undue repetition in each trial—including in the two most recent trials, Nolte and the Mitchell retrial—even as the Court's time limitations have shortened with successive trials. The Court continues to believe that the trials in this MDL proceeding reasonably can and should be tried in a period of no more than two weeks.

The length of an average trial day in this courthouse is, and long has been, five hours. Thus a three week (fifteen day) trial typically would involve no more than seventy-five hours, and a two-and-one-half week (twelve or thirteen day) trial typically would involve no more than sixty or sixty-five hours.

The Court allocates a total of fifty-eight hours to the May 7, 2018 bellwether trial in Myers v. AbbVie, not counting jury selection. Given the ordinary allocation of five hours per trial day, this would amount to a little under twelve full trial days, not including jury selection. Because, however, the Court will set a longer-than-normal trial day, fewer than twelve days will be required.

The Court sets aside the following dates for trial to the extent necessary: May 7-11, 2018, May 14-18, 2018 (the Court will be unavailable on March 15), and May 21, 2018, plus further dates after May 21 as necessary. The trial day typically will extend from 9:30 or 9:45 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. and from 1:30 p.m. to 5:00 p.m., with mid-morning and mid-afternoon breaks. The Court notes that this is longer than its typical trial day and will result in a trial day of about six hours. The Court reserves the right to extend any given trial day to 5:15 or 5:30 if warranted in order to complete the trial within the dates set aside.

The Court will allocate half of the trial time to plaintiffs and half to defendants. Time will count against a side's allocation whenever it is questioning a witness, arguing an objection or other matters to the Court, making an opening statement or closing argument, or otherwise presenting its case. Time spent arguing evidentiary or other in limine matters, including the Court's review of written submissions on such matters,¹ will count against a side's allocation. The Court also reserves the right to count the time spent following the start of the trial arguing jury instruction issues. Time used for questions to witnesses by jurors will not be allocated to either side.

If a party intends to read or play deposition testimony before the jury, this may require the Court to rule on objections to designated testimony. The reading of deposition testimony will, of course, constitute trial time. Time will count against a side's allocation for all testimony that side has designated to be read. The parties are directed to confer prior to the presentation of any deposition testimony to attempt to agree upon how the time spent reading or playing the deposition should be allocated. In this regard, the Court encourages the parties to do their best to pare down deposition testimony to significant and non-repetitive matters. In addition, all such time the Court spends before or during trial considering each party's objections to deposition testimony is time that would be spent in court were the witnesses being presented live. For this reason, that time will count against the side making the objection, unless and to the extent that the Court determines that the party designating the objected-to testimony has designated testimony of limited probative value or that is otherwise unduly repetitive or cumulative.

The allocation of fifty-eight hours is subject to reduction based on rulings barring or limiting claims, precluding opinion witness testimony, and excluding or limiting evidence via in limine rulings and rulings made during trial. In addition, based on its observation and review of the opening statements and closing arguments at the previous bellwether trials, the Court has determined that the length of those parts of the trial should have specific time limitations. Opening statements may not exceed 45 minutes per side, and closing arguments may not exceed a total of 75 minutes per side (plaintiffs may allocate their time between opening and rebuttal as they wish).

The Court reserves the right to adjust the total time and each side's allocation upward or downward for good cause. Good cause to adjust an allocation downward may include, among other things, presenting unduly cumulative testimony or evidence, unduly presenting evidence of minimal probative value, or making unwarranted objections to testimony or exhibits. With regard to exhibits, consistent with the Court's comments in connection with earlier trials, the Court directs the parties to confer promptly to attempt to pare down their exhibit lists, resolve foundational objections to exhibits by stipulation or otherwise, and attempt to narrow objections to exhibits to the extent reasonably possible. The Court reserves the right to impose an overall limit on the number of exhibits introduced by each side.

Further particulars of the rules for time allocation may be addressed at or before the trial.

In addition, the Court will exercise its authority pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 611 to require that each witness will be called only once and will not be recalled later in the case, except to rebut evidence offered later that the party wishing to recall the witness could not reasonably have anticipated. Consistent with this directive, there will be no restriction on the scope of cross-examination of a witness called by an adverse party.

Consistent with the Court's practice in several recent bellwether trials, examination of a witness beyond redirect (beyond "recross," for a witness called by an adverse party) will not be permitted absent a showing at sidebar—for which the requesting party will be charged time—that the immediately preceding examination by the other side raised new points that the party has been unable to address adequately.

The Court also advises that to minimize interruptions in the jury's receipt of evidence, it will continue its practice of limiting the number and extent of sidebar conferences while the jury is present in the courtroom. If a party anticipates that a matter may come up during a witness's testimony that will require discussion outside the jury's presence, the party should raise the matter beforehand at a break. Where this does not occur, and discussion outside the jury's presence is requested or is necessary, the Court may require the testimony to proceed while holding to the next break the issue to be discussed.

Finally, the Court reminds the parties that it expects and directs counsel for both sides to advise witnesses in advance of their testimony of in limine rulings that may impact the witness's testimony – in particular, rulings that preclude or limit admission of evidence about which the witness might otherwise testify.
